VIRGINIA WOOLF · 1942

The Vitality of Life

In Woolf’s “The Death of the Moth,” a day-moth shares the life energy of the September countryside.

The Windowpane

A frail speck fluttering corner to corner, pure energy confined within glass.

The Wide Fields

Rooks wheeling over Sussex downs and horses plowing the earth in the same vitality.

Made with GAMMA

AN OBSERVATIONAL SEQUENCE

The Struggle Against Death

Watching the moth's vitality ebb reveals the profound vulnerability binding all living creatures.

Vigorous flight

Dashing tirelessly across the windowpane, imbued with unthinking zest.

Failed attempts

Fluttering slides into exhaustion; slipping repeatedly to the sill.

The final righting

Legs convulse in one immense, heroic effort to turn upright.

Stillness

The tiny body straightens uncomplaining; struggle yields to silence.

A qualitative progression of life encountering its limit.

Made with GAMMA

THE UNIVERSAL LAW

The Universal Triumph of Death

100%

INEVITABILITY · AN IMPERSONAL POWER

> “death is stronger than I am.”

WOOLF’S IMAGINED CONFESSION FOR THE MOTH

Death stands not as a cruel foe, but as an overwhelming, indifferent certainty that triumphs over every living particle.

Made with GAMMA